We know that anal tumours are particularly malignant, often become quickly inoperable, and haven't good response to traditional therapies. In particular, these tumours often give subocclusive phenomenons, bleeding, abscesses and pain.

The synergism of radiotherapy and hyperthermia now demonstrated by many Authors, gives the possibility to make an optimizing treatment of these patients, with results better than the results obtained with radiotherapy alone or other therapies over all about the prevention of local complications (bleeding, abscesses and fistulas) and about the treatment of pain with a better "performance status" of these patients. Our experience is based on the treatment with radiotherapy following within 30 minutes from hyperthermic treatment, with radiofrequency equipment of LeVein, at 13,56 MHz, of five patients affected by inoperable and stenosing epidermoidal anal carcinoma.

The Authors emphasize the Radiotherapy-Hyperthermia combination after an analysis of their results obtained in this initial experience.
